On Tuesday, officials from major US financial institutions met with members of Congress about the next generation of consumer protection legislation. Among the proposals to emerge from the meeting was a proposal for new, sweeping legislation to protect consumers from the "repricing" of financial products. The notice of the meetings was sent to members of Congress by the Financial Services Roundtable, which represents large players in the financial sector, including the 16 largest US bank holding companies and 10 of the largest investment banks. The Financial Services Roundtable did not provide a copy of the proposed legislation, but according to the Wall Street Journal, it includes many of the same ideas that a legislative initiative published by the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB) just last week contained. The roundtable's proposal, which it said was "tentative," includes new disclosure requirements for new financial products, including mortgage loan guarantees that turn into insurance policies, often with "twice the cost." It also includes measures to ban fees that are "hidden from view" in what it calls "contingent interest rate exposure" products, which it says are now used to "manipulate borrowers into taking on excessive debt loads" when the interest rates are set to go down. While the roundtable's proposal would apply only to "new" products and "new" financial products, the CFPB's initiative included provisions that would apply to old and new products. The proposals were first outlined in a Wall Street Journal article last week. The CFPB's was the most comprehensive and sweeping proposal yet to come from the administration, and the most public and of particular interest to the roundtable, which until recently was as hawkish as the administration on the issue of financial reform. To understand the administration's new proposal, the roundtable's new initiative, and the original CFPB proposal, it's useful to understand the financial products that the roundtable is trying to protect. The function of finance is to convert economic activity from the production of goods and services into useable capital. Wall Street can do this better than any other sector. Its financial products (including insurance and debt instruments) enable individuals and companies to transfer economic value. The easiest way to do this is with money. A loan, for example, is an IOU that someone can accept to do something, such as make a purchase or buy a business. Finance is not so much about the principle or economic value of these transactions as it

Molecular cloning and characterization of a novel melatonin receptor in red seabream, Pagrus major. Melatonin is a hormone that regulates a large variety of physiological processes including the endocrine system and the sleep-waking cycle. We cloned and characterized a cDNA encoding a novel melatonin receptor in red seabream, Pagrus major. It was cloned by reverse transcription-polymerase chain reaction (RT-PCR) and rapid amplification of cDNA ends (RACE) methods from red seabream brain RNA using degenerate primers designed from the amino-acid sequence of the zebrafish (Danio rerio) melatonin receptor 1a (mt1a) receptor (AATTTGCTCAGCGTCTCTAG and GTCGTGCTGGATTTTTGTCA). The predicted full-length cDNA of the red seabream melatonin receptor (rpgr) was 1626 bp long and it included a putative 879 bp open reading frame encoding 290 amino acids with 5 transmembrane domains. The deduced amino-acid sequence of rpgr showed high similarity to that of other reported teleost fish melatonin receptors, such as zebrafish, swordtail, and ricefield eels. Whole-mount in situ hybridization showed that rpgr mRNA was expressed in red seabream brain and eye. Melatonin (0.1 microM) induced c-Fos expression in red seabream brain and pineal organ cultures. The expression of rpgr mRNA in red seabream brain decreased after exogenous melatonin and increased after light treatment, suggesting that rpgr is regulated by light and melatonin.
